

The ReLife Group is now

Benfante Group and Bosco Marengo Paper Mill have created the first Italian network for the Circular Economy, with a global turnover of around 140 million euro a year.

The strength of the Italian economy stands in the ability of its entrepreneurs. Six million companies, each with individual skills, have been able to generate important value.

This ability has been handed down from one generation to the next and development strategies have been careful not to lose original identity. This trend is evident in the collection and recovery sector. Logistic costs and low added value of waste have created a scattered market with more than 600 private companies, which rarely exceed a scope of 60 km. The small companies struggle to achieve appreciable scale economies and hardly gain the opportunity to make strategic investments.

11 Italian businesses have taken up the challenge, with the support of Xenon Private Equity, and created ReLife Group.

Benfante Group, already operating with a network of companies for the collection, transport and sorting of recoverable materials, meets up with Bosco Marengo Paper Mill, producer of grey board from recovered paper. Together, they take the first step towards industrial integration aimed at generating the maximum value in the paper recycling chain.

Relife Group brings together traditional efficiency and creative skills of a family-run business with the strength of an well-organised group which is present throughout the country, structured to maximize scale economy and expertise, with a network of international sales.

Now Italian producers and retails can entrust industrial waste to those who can guarantee multiple solutions and optimize costs while ensuring transparency, traceability and professionalism.

Now Italian producers and retailers can use recovered paper under the ReLife label to complete the environmental loop and demonstrate to Consumers that the Circular Economy is here and now.
